

Columbia Business School

With thousands of multinational companies, a diverse real-estate market and the major stock, bond and commodity exchanges, New York City is a living laboratory for the Columbia Business School community. Students can talk one-on-one with corporate stars about their successful strategies — and about the things they might have done differently. Faculty members' work with these same stars enriches research and teaching at the School.

Business Center

New York is a major capital of industry — finance and fashion, media and high tech, arts and entertainment, real estate and manufacturing. It is the top echelon of virtually every business in the world. And it is home to thousands of Columbia Business School alumni, who welcome MBA students into their professions and wide-ranging networks.

Approachable Alumni

Thanks to the far-reaching Columbia Business School network, leaders in virtually every industry are accessible. Because these alumni know firsthand the value of a Columbia MBA, they seek out our graduates to mentor and to hire. Thousands of them are just a subway ride away — and thousands more span the globe, acting as resources for students and fellow alumni wherever the career path leads.

Cultural Capital

More than 10,000 restaurants. Scores of museums. Professional sports teams. Broadway, Off-Broadway, Off-Off-Broadway. Movies you won't see anywhere else. Any kind of music you feel like hearing. Hundreds of bookstores. And all of it just a stroll, a subway ride or a taxi trip away. New York is one of the world's magnets — and Columbia MBA students enjoy its pleasures as residents.
